

Working Title: Murder on Grounds

Story:

- I want the crime (probably murder to take place at UVA)
- Maybe make the game similar to Murdle (<https://murdle.com/>) with clues like:
 - o “Suspect A (they will have a name in the real game) was last seen at the rotunda”
 - o “Suspect B is allergic to flowers”
 - This will indicate that they weren’t in a specific location
- Suspects will be stereotypical UVA students
 - o A CS major
 - o A Comm School kid
 - o A Premed
 - o An English major
 - o A Professor
- When making an accusation the player will have the option to guess how, where, and why
 - o Each question will be a separate choice, and the player will have to guess
 - o On each attempt the player will be able to figure out how much of their guess is correct
 - o The player will only be allowed three guesses before the game ends
- Featured locations in the game:
 - o The Rotunda
 - o Rice Hall
 - o Shannon Library
 - o The Amphitheatre
 - o New Cabell Hall
- Weapons used
 - o A Milton Anthology
 - o A laptop
 - o Poisoned O’hill Food
 - o Cav Man’s sword
 - o A brick

Reflection:

This week’s class discussion was interesting. I think that the distinctions we made between 2D, and 3D particularly caught my interest because I am still not completely sure I understand what we concluded. I will say that I think it is easy to think that 2D games are simpler than 3D games, but that 2D games are still quite complex. In fact, I would argue that they might be more complex than 3D games just in the sense that they have to create a whole world but only by using two dimensions. Additionally, in class we talked about how Clune’s idea that playing a game or finishing a task in a game with other people makes the game more fulfilling and fun was fascist. I kind of see where he's coming from. But I still don't agree with many of his takes like Kyah was saying in class on Wednesday.

I have also begun working on my game. So far, I haven't run into many difficulties, but I am sure that will change as I get further along. For this week's assignment I am only submitting some notes that I have, because even though I have started writing the story, I feel like it's not ready to share yet. As I plan more the more excited as I get about completing the whole thing.
